Hope

Hope is a group of friends, that hurt you and ignore you, cutting deep into your personality, but keep you around, because one day you might be cool enough to be part of them.

Hope is a partner, that you know you can fix, despite that your arm is in a cast, again, and covering up blue spots is part of your makeup routine.

Hope is a parent, that lists every single things wrong with you, different and disgusting, and reminds you of the burdens you place on others, of the cost of your upkeep, but one that says it out of love, wanting you to become better.

Hope is the voice in your ear, that convinces you to enter an ever-tightening tunnel, with walls covered in glass shards, telling you that it thought it saw a shimmer at the end, that might maybe be a diamond.

And as you move along the tunnel, and the walls move in closer, ever-deeper gashes are opened in your skin, your blood trickling out, staining the shimmer you leave behind, in red.

As you lay there, broken, hope is the one to prod your pain and taunt you. Is this all you have in you? You can do better. There's more to you, that hasn't been broken, yet.

You wouldn't want to give up.

Please, give up.
